Excerpt: . . . 11 ment the tools to restructure or wind down a failing systemically important firm in a way that mitigates the risks to financial sta-bility and the economy and that protects the public interest. It also would provide the government a mechanism for imposing losses on the shareholders and the creditors of the firm. Establishing cred-ible processes for imposing such losses is essential to restoring a meaningful degree of market discipline and addressing the too-big-to-fail problem. The availability of a workable resolution regime also will replace the need for the Federal Reserve to use its emergency lending au-thority under 13 (3) of the Federal Reserve Act to prevent the fail-ure of specific institutions. Payment, clearing, and settlement arrangements are the founda-tion of the Nations financial infrastructure. These arrangements include centralized market utilities for clearing and settling pay-ments, securities, and derivative transactions, as well as the decen-tralized activities through which financial institutions clear and settle transactions bilaterally. While these arrangements can cre-ate significant efficiencies and promote transparency in the finan-cial markets, they also may concentrate substantial credit, liquid-ity, and operational risks and, absent strong risk controls, may themselves be a source of contagion in times of stress. Unfortunately, the current regulatory and supervisory frame-work for systemically important payment, clearing, and settlement arrangements is fragmented, creating the potential for inconsistent standards to be adopted or applied. Under the current system, no single regulators is able to develop a comprehensive understanding of the interdependencies, risks, and risk-management approaches across the full range of arrangem. ....
