Opinion of the Court, per GRAY, J. grantee to hold the lands on the further trust, after her decease, to convey them in fee simple to her children living at her decease and the surviving children of such of them as may then be dead. This was not one of the express trusts permitted by the fifty-fifth section of the statutes of uses and trusts. That this was an express trust, which, for not being comprehended within those authorized by the statute, might be recognized as a power in trust, under its 58th section, the appellant questions. He insists that it was only a formal trust, which, by force of the statute, would be converted at once into a legal estate in remainder in its intended beneficiaries; to wit, in the children of Mrs. Curtis. He says that the trust was of a passive character; because conferring no control over the property, and that it was executed by the statute. (1 R. s. 72s, 4749. ) Prior to the Revised Statutes and at common law, a trust to convey was certainly recognized as a special or active trust. Mr. Perry, in his work on Trusts (vol. 1, p. 305), speaking of instances at common law of how the legal estate may be prevented from vesting in the cestui Que trust...
